By Traci Hurrell
Go buy this book. I was captivated through his entire adventure. The imagery was so well done that I could actually picture myself right there with him. I could imagine myself on his bike touring the countrysides and what it would be like to live in a tent for so long. His love for the culture that he came across and appreciation of little things made the book relatable. I enjoyed the way that he led the story..he'd write about a topic and it would lead me to thinking questions I would want answered and sure enough in the next chapter, as if reading my mind, the questions were answered. He made me laugh uncontrollably and gave me much to ponder. His observations really forced me to question the paradigm in which I live...and for the better. I highly recommend this book. If you're looking for an adventure, take a trip through this book and come to love a country you may have never stepped foot in, but will feel like you have once you're finished.

Very well written and many laugh-out-loud moments. But most important - and FINALLY - a proper definition of Adventure for the 21st century, hyper-connected society that we live in. Stefan offers a new and proper accounting of how to marry travel with technology in the internet age. Its not a book about getting away from technology, nor is it a book about technology. Just a proper accounting of how use our legs and technologies to experience Freedom, a concept I see as almost synonymous with Adventure after reading this book. It is a book simply about travel, less about how to travel, and really not about where to travel, but simply, well, wandering. Oh, and as you can tell from the Twit in the title - it is also about how not to travel.

By Mike Adair
This is a fun ride of a book that's hard to stop. I actually followed Stefan's trek on Google Maps as I read and even flew down for a street view at some of the sites. Such beautiful country, great stories and insights! My son and I are just now thinking about strapping our backpacking gear to our bikes and this book pushed us over the fence. But it's not really a "how to" but a "why would you" kind of book.

We have a limited time on Earth. What will you do with yours? Stefan Abrutat found his calling by chance, on a bicycle tour around Great Britain, initially to ascertain the effect communication technology was having on population distribution. This purpose was soon discarded, however, as he unearthed a forgotten way of living, a nomadic lifestyle far more in tune with humanity's primary genetic motivators than commuting to a computer to electronically shuffle virtual paper. Drawn from his blogs, this hilarious account of his first leg through the north of England and Scotland follows Abrutat as he comes to grips with the independent realities of the road, and the very real joys, dangers, enlightenments and perspectives that accompany them.
