It is a love story between an American couple and the folks they met in the Ukraine. It chronicles the inspiring effort put forth by the author and her husband who, of one mind, went to Russia to share the Baha'i Faith. I was astonished and pleased at the continuing insights into folks that they met and how those folks reacted to this American couple with such love. It is a story of both deprivation and love, deprivation because, of course, this is Russia, and those certain deprivations suffered by the citizens of the Ukraine were suffered by the visiting couple as well, and love because this couple is filled with love and they share it wherever they go and find it is mirrored back to them. They, like the populace in the town they were visiting, waited in long lines for bread and yet, in spite of the periodic uncertainty of food shortages, in spite of hot water shortages which evolved into water shortages which finally evolved into no water at all, this American couple bounced back due to a strong belief that if their new Russian friends could endure these privations, so could they, and they were sustained by being able to commiserate with these dear new friends, often joking about their mutual predicament. I love this book and have read it several times...so far. I learned so much about Russian people, about the love that they gave to Esther and her husband Bill, how they shared their children, their lives and their food in times of shortages. I do not believe that anyone could read this heartfelt story and fail to be moved by it. Kudos to Ms. Bradley-deTally on this endearing recounting of their time in Russia and about her providing time after time, proof that mankind, indeed, is one. 0 of 0

Bradley-Detally is a writing teacher and comfortable with pen and paper. She's especially interested in the people, not the politics. The harshness of Russian daily life comes through in this interesting and sometimes surprising read.
